By Nick Verone

The Whitehead Institute (WI) at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) has announced a change in the date of its homecoming event. The Whitehead, which is known for being a highly prestigious research institute, had initially scheduled the event for October 23, but due to a change in plans, it has been moved to June 1, 2018.

The decision to change the date was made by the Whitehead faculty, who voted almost unanimously in favor of the Whitehead institution's name being used in an event that would occur on June 1, which is also the date of the MIT's eleventh president, Nannerl O. Keohane's, inauguration.

Other museums and hotels are also being considered. Some faculty members have expressed concern that this change in date will not be convenient for students and faculty members. However, the Whitehead faculty has expressed enthusiasm about the change, saying it will be "basically very expensive." Bands and other events have been planned for the date.

The controversy over the move has led to a debate about the opportunities for the Whitehead faculty. Some members are concerned that the move will cause problems for students and faculty members. Others, however, see it as a way to "bolster the day" Shavuot spending the day (Shavuot) studying Jewish law.

According to Goldberg, the number of students and faculty affected would be relatively small. "The final decision will be made this year," Goldberg said. "I am enthusiastic about the change in date because of strong consensus of the faculty on the issue."