It was not only proper but useful and urgent for "The Tech" to report on Oct. 9, the allegatio ns that Taiwanese students at MIT are being subjected to spying by their government. Some Taiwanese students in the US live under the constant shadow of the death of a Taiwanese political refugee who took his own life while visiting the US. Their image as a group of students has been marred by recently suspected as spies. One incident was when a Chinese student's car was broken into and his passport was stolen. Another was when a Taiwanese student was suspected of being a spy upon return to Taiwan. These incidents are a misuse of the "Spy Issue".

The "Spy Issue" is not the only problem Taiwanese students face. They also face discrimination and harassment on campus. The Taiwanese are often suspected of being spies by their peers, students from other countries, and even faculty members. The Taipei government is suspected of being behind these incidents. The government of Taiwan has used scare tactics to keep its citizens from leaving the country. This has caused a rift between the government and its citizens. The Taiwanese government has also been accused of using its military to spy on its own citizens.

In conclusion, the Taiwanese students at MIT are facing a number of challenges. They are being suspected of being spies, discriminator yed, and harassed. The Taiwanese government is suspected of being behind these incidents. The Taiwanese students are not alone in their struggles. Many students around the world face similar challenges. The Taiwanese students at MIT deserve our support and understanding. They are fighting for their rights and their country. We can all learn from their struggles and stand with them in their fight.
