Gray: Whitehead no conflict

The Boston Globe's Cambridge, Massachusetts, edition, in its report on the events surrounding the shooting of MIT police officer Robert Davis on April 22, 1979, and the subsequent investigation, provides a glimpse into the atmosphere of tension and uncertainty that characterized the academic community at the time.

The report begins with a description of the shooting itself, noting that Davis was shot and killed during an attempted arrest of a suspect in a series of armed robberies. The suspect, identified as a 19-year-old student named John C. Farmer, was eventually arrested and convicted of the crimes.

The article goes on to discuss the subsequent investigation by the FBI, which is described as a major intelligence operation that involved the广州's Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The report notes that the investigation was conducted in a manner that was consistent with the FBI's and CIA's practices, which are typically directed at preventing and investigating acts of terrorism and espionage.

The article also mentions that the investigation was conducted in a way that was consistent with the FBI's and CIA's practices, which are typically directed at preventing and investigating acts of terrorism and espionage.
