between students and instructors. "It's not a matter of time or busisiness," MacVicar said.

Although the Registrar's Office will collect the spring term freshman grades, "The Registrar is supposed to do nothing with that information" except return it, he said. Vilasek added, "I would have to argue there is some value to being an institution" in compiling data on freshman performance, such as the hidden grades, noted Peter H. Richardson, '86, Director of Admissions.

Both the Undergraduate Association General Assembly (GA) and the Student Committee on Education Policy (SCEP) voted to oppose the CEP plan. The GA proposed the check-box system extend to the spring term, rather than adding hidden grades, noted Bryan H. Williams, '86, Director of Admissions.

In other business, the faculty approved a master's program in Polisical Science and Public Policy, which will meet an increased interest in public policy, competition in the field from rival institutions, and "a high degree of employability for its graduates," according to Professor Robert L. Rothberg.

Professor Herbert Hollomon, Director of the Center for Policy Alternatives, contended the degree program "lacks an educational center." He complained it was similar to the Technology and Policy Program and similar programs, "it is really discussed by . . . the proliferation of related master's programs."

The faculty approved an experimental doctoral program in health policy and management, the first degree program exclusively from the Whartan College of Health Sciences, Technology, and Management. Not more than 10 students will be admitted into the program each year, and they will be supported by the Henry J. Kaiser Foundation, according to Professor Edward B. Roberts.

The faculty also passed a resonovation in memory of, and in tribute to former Institute Professor Emilowitz Robert Jackson, who died last summer.
