Eric R. Fleming

Considering the best parts of Men’s Basketball this past year

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was
powerful by a tournament-high

Now that the hoop season is over, it's time for my annual column devoted to looking back at the last four years of MIT men's basketball, and pick out some of the best (and worst) experiences.

Before beginning, I should caution you that the views expressed here necessarily reflect those of Eric R. Fleming, MIT's men's basketball manager, and opposing views are quite unimportant.

Anyway, here they are:

Best games: Dan Trant, Clark; Mark Brunch, MIT. Brunch's accomplishments have been well heralded in these pages, nothing
sounds immodest, but I've heard of Rayr~

Best forward: Ray Nagem, MIT; Chris Jerome, Bowdoin; Kevin Clark, Clark. Though I saw Nagem for just one year, he impressed me with some great low post moves, often against opponents two or three inches tall-

Best center: Peter Dorfman, Connecticut College. A tough
category, because forwards often play the post spot. Dorfman
made the Camels during the last two years; without him, they would not have been as good a team.

Favorite game: WPI, Amherst, Briggs Cage, Harvard. WPI was powerful by a tournament-high