Editor's Note: The Tech received a copy of the following letter addressed to MIT President Paul Gray 34.

Dear President Gray

Recently several Institute committees were charged with investigating the feasibility of a Wellesley-MIT double degree program which would allow Wellesley students to combine courses at both schools through the existing cross-registration program, and obtain two degrees in five years.

The program would require the Wellesley student to apply by her second year for transfer to MIT, which would occur at the end of the third year. It would be limited to ten students per year, the expected number is three or four students. Although most student-faculty committees and several individuals did not respond favorably to the program, measures are nevertheless being taken to implement it.

We would like to address several concerns at once in order to return the proposed double degree program—programs which the supporters of the program apparently find unimportant. First, the fact that a student would be considered without any input from the student body simply reveals the lack of communication between the administration and the students. The proposed program may seem like a small issue, a mere extension of the already existing relationship with Wellesley, yet it will reinforce the narrow image of MIT as a male school. If the MIT student body put from the MIT student body

We would like to address several concerns at once in order to return the proposed double degree program—programs which the supporters of the program apparently find unimportant. First, the fact that a student would be considered without any input from the student body simply reveals the lack of communication between the administration and the students. The proposed program may seem like a small issue, a mere extension of the already existing relationship with Wellesley, yet it will reinforce the narrow image of MIT as a male school. If the MIT student body

We would like to address several concerns at once in order to return the proposed double degree program—programs which the supporters of the program apparently find unimportant. First, the fact that a student would be considered without any input from the student body simply reveals the lack of communication between the administration and the students. The proposed program may seem like a small issue, a mere extension of the already existing relationship with Wellesley, yet it will reinforce the narrow image of MIT as a male school. If the MIT student body

We would like to address several concerns at once in order to return the proposed double degree program—programs which the supporters of the program apparently find unimportant. First, the fact that a student would be considered without any input from the student body simply reveals the lack of communication between the administration and the students. The proposed program may seem like a small issue, a mere extension of the already existing relationship with Wellesley, yet it will reinforce the narrow image of MIT as a male school. If the MIT student body

We would like to address several concerns at once in order to return the proposed double degree program—programs which the supporters of the program apparently find unimportant. First, the fact that a student would be considered without any input from the student body simply reveals the lack of communication between the administration and the students. The proposed program may seem like a small issue, a mere extension of the already existing relationship with Wellesley, yet it will reinforce the narrow image of MIT as a male school. If the MIT student body