The department has taken such measures on a small scale already, he said.
Course VI faculty members have no time to plan research or to write textbooks, Wilson asserted. The department may have to eliminate the thesis requirement because the faculty cannot supervise as many students. The department would require 30 faculty and a $1.8 million budget increase to teach students adequately if the faculty chose not to act, Wilson said.
The faculty then rejected the motion, 131 to 67.
The faculty question may have unduly influenced some members, Smith said. "There are a lot of [faculty members] who don't know how admissions works. ... The fairness question made it easier for the faculty to reject the proposal," Smith said.
"The committee will meet on Thursday," Smith said. "I would like to come back [before the faculty with a proposal] in February."
Moses declined to comment after the faculty's announcement.
Members will meet again on Dec. 21 at a regularly scheduled faculty meeting.
