The book of thy student Job

While excavating under what is now the medical department, our crack archaeologists uncovered a washing machine. Within this machine was a treasure trove of unpaired socks, and several scrolls written in Ugaritic. We have here reproduced, in translation, the text of one of them.

In the fourth year of the exile, bringing the third year of the reign of King Paul, after the Blizzard, I was sitting by the banks of the river Charles, ministering to the cities there. And I lifted up my eyes and saw before me a vision of the Gray One '54. And so, all of the vice presidents and Institute professors were going to and fro singing his praises. Then entered the Constantinoplugus, and verily did the Gray One '54 say unto the Constantinoplugus, "Where, oh Constantinoplugus, comest thou from?"

"Verily then," saith the Gray One '54, "thou must unseat my student Job with whatever thou wilt, but harm not his GPA."

II

Now Job, being a righteous nerd, did dwell in a West Campus dormitory. And he had an Apple II with two disk drives, a color monitor, and a printer. Also, Job had an HP-41CV upon which he ran many programs. Job also had a loft, and a refrigerator, and an account on Matlab.

And behold, the Constantinoplugus came down and smote Job, and Job got a D in 6.002, for it was decreed in those days that he who got a D in 6.002 could not be initiated into the mysteries of flowing electrons. However, Constantinoplugus gave Job two As and a B for effect Job's GPA. This vexed Job greatly because of the decree that was in the land at that time. Neve the less, Job would not curse the Institute and transfer.

So the Constantinoplugus went before the Academic Council and hardened their hearts so they would cause tuition to increase many times greater than the cost of living. Yet, even though Job had to sell all of his possessions, and scrape his bank account with a pet scard, he would not curse the Institute and transfer.
