Smooth sailing in Salvadoran elections — The first free elections in 50 years for a civilian president in El Salvador were held Sunday with no internal disruptions, a marked contrast to violence-racked preliminary-round voting in March. However, a helicopter carrying US ambassador Thomas R. Pickering and two members of Congress, who were monitoring the elections, was fired upon by leftist guerrillas, as was a helicopter carrying journalists; no injuries were reported. Exit polls conducted by a Spanish television network predicted moderate conservative Jose Napoleon Duarte as the clear victor over left-of-center Roberto D'Aubuisson. D'Aubuisson is reported to have fled the so-called "death squads."

Pope attacked in Korea — A man armed with a toy cap pistol fired on Pope John Paul II as he rode in a motorcade Sunday in Seoul, South Korea. The unidentified assailant fired four bullets, and was immediately subdued and sent for psychiatric testing. The Pope spoke as scheduled later in the day, urging a crowd of 300,000 "to fight for workers' rights."

Mondale, Jackson split twin bill — Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale swept to victory in the Texas Democratic primary Sunday, carrying 56 percent of the vote. The Rev. Jesse L. Jackson won the Louisiana primary with 41 percent of votes cast. Sen. Gary W. Hart, who placed second in both contests, has been advised by some of his backers to withdraw from the campaign if he fails to win at least one of today's primaries in Ohio, Indiana, North Carolina and Maryland. Mondale now has approximately 1,400 delegates committed to him, about twice as many as second-place Hart, and less than 600 short of guaranteeing a first-ballot nomination.
