To the Editor:
The following is a response to Simon L. Garfinkel's column on Project Interphase:

Dear Simon,

I read with interest your open letter to President Paul E. Gray '54 on Project Interphase. While there is much in the column that is correct, let me clear some obvious errors by briefly describing what Project Interphase is all about.

The program seeks to ensure success of minority students at MIT by improving the academic and social skills of a selected group of minority students who are invited to attend. The criteria for selection include: prior or student experience in summer programs like this; the quality of the high school from which the student comes (has it been able to provide exposure to labs, lecture, and other academic opportunities); high quality educational services (i.e., high quality educational services?); the competitive academic environment from which the student comes; the social environment from which the student comes (like MIT?); the academic record of the student's personality. I.e., maybe the student is a bit too shy.

An examination of these selection criteria then provides some of the reasons why we have a Project Interphase — to eliminate potential stumbling blocks before the MIT semester begins so that students will not feel inadequate about themselves at MIT. Should it be available to all students? Certainly a program like this would be of value to many students.
