Freshman worries past and present

"The most stringently enforced of all the freshman rules is that concerning time. It has been repeated to us, over and over again, that the freshmen are a race apart, and that we must set a good example to the rest of the student body. This means, of course, that we must be on time for all our classes, and that we must not be late for any of our exams."

If that year was '84, the freshman regulations of 1928. How archaic, you think. How like high school, when most MIT freshmen are privileged citizens, given free food and free transportation, and invited to participate in special programs. Everyone pats them on the back..."
