MIT community members address safety law

"They happen in labs with respected principal investigators," Parker said, emphasizing that many accidents happen through ignorance rather than carelessness. "It might not be with malicious intent, but things get overlooked... I think what is supposed to go on and what does go on are two different things."

"I'm surprised [to hear this] and I think Dr. Alberty is surprised," Parker said. "We're going to have to go back and examine our criteria and see if requiring training is a good thing if it doesn't get done."

"We have not mandated any [safety routine] style for any particular department. We find when things go on are two different things."

Another member of the audience asked if MIT would make the application public to the community. "That would be an administrative decision," she noted. "It's a case by case situation about the toxic chemicals he received information that the community will get the balance."
