Harvard students rally against South Africa

(Continued from page 1) over 30 years and having failed, our parents have been, with choice but to take up arms," he said.

A group led by students from the Harvard Law School began a "24-hour vigil for divestment" in front of Massachusetts Hall, the home of the office of Harvard President Derek Bok, following Brown's speech. The demonstrators sang, read poems and chanted protest slogans during their enactment. The protest included a 9 pm procession in memory of black South Africans. The procession culminated in front of Massachusetts Hall with the planting of mock gravestones listing the names of those killed.

Reagan compromises on financial aid budget

(Continued from page 1) "The real cost of a year at MIT ($56,000) is denied and set arbitrary at $8000, while the family's ability to contribute is taken at full value," Gallagher said. "A family that can now pay half the real cost, and now is awarded federal aid toward the remaining $8000, would under the proposed formula be foreclosed able to pay the full cost and be ineligible for federal funds," he added.

This plan will affect families whose incomes are as low as $40,000, Gallagher said, and "neatly pulls the rug out from under middle-income families whose sons and daughters desire to attend higher-cost colleges."

The administration's decision to abandon its initial plan was primarily due to effective lobbying by college leaders, Secretary of Education William J. Bennett has claimed that Reagan's proposed plan would not necessarily impose hardships upon students (Continued from next page)