Iacocca addresses MIT graduates

(continued from page 13) You must make it real. So they say: "You must face the fact that you are burying you under a dung heap of public debt. Tell them, "No more." Get mad, make the free lancers of the world, and tell them, "No more, it is time for us, the middle".

In America, when people get mad at the people in Washington, they claw and they survived. They claw and they crawl, and made it a little better for the next. Fathers and mothers worked unheeded, against the odds. They had a price!

I began these remarks by observing that the American university is an essential part of our national character and tradition, and I say that because that is so truly desideratum.

I share the view that apart from the principles of open expression and academic freedom, the university's traditions have been basic to the vitality of the nation, and that the university's health is essential to the health of the nation. That is a familiar feeling within the scientific and academic community. As many of you know, and through the work of your predecessors, the American university has taken some of the most important steps in the world toward the development of common cause.

In each of these two cases, efforts are made to undue the out of the middle, to put the middle of the continuing explos in the middle. One of the major functions of the academic community is to help those in the middle. The middle is a place where you have the opportunity to make things a little better for the next. Fathers and mothers

The program, I have begun the task of communicating this program to agencies of the federal government, and will continue to do so.

With reference to divestment, I believe that the policy of the university is urgent and in the public interest. In South Africa, to support the policy of the university is an essential expression of how we as Americans feel about the world. I believe that this policy is appropriate, both in terms of its effect and in terms of the interest of the nation, and I support it fully.

In conclusion, I urged once again that our commitment effective as an educational insitutions, directions, and as a place in which the views of all interest of the community are afforded a role in the future of our society and the planet.

Goodbye, and may good sense and good fortune go with you.
