Overcrowded housing and misjudgments in admissions have plagued MIT for the past four years in a row. Nearly twice as many freshmen as living in crowded dormitory rooms this fall as the Office of the Dean for Student Affairs originally expected.

Over half of all freshmen living in dormitories, together with some sophomores, live in rooms that are crowded. Some fraternity rooms have crowded freshmen spaces appearing during the year because of early graduations certainty it faces and leave more margin certainty. The Academic Council should take account of the unmeasurement is meaningless without a statement of its uncertainty. The Academic Council should not hesitate to reduce the class size.

The overcrowding has almost reached the record attained in 1980, the year before Next House opened. At that time, MIT mistakenly believed the new dormitory to student life. It is unacceptable. What should be done? Scientists and engineers know that a mistake is made unless it is corrected.

Morals must be consistent

October 8, 1985

Dear Editor:

In recent years, we have come to realize that there is a need for a moral compass in our society. The values we hold dear are essential to guide our actions and decisions. However, many of us lack a clear understanding of what constitutes a moral compass. Is it simply about following the letter of the law, or is it about adhering to the spirit of the law? Is it about following the majority view, or is it about standing up for what we believe is right? These are all important questions that we must consider when determining what is moral and what is not.

In my opinion, a moral compass is a set of principles that guide our actions and decisions. It is a guidepost that helps us make choices that are consistent with our values and beliefs. It is a tool that helps us navigate through the complexities of life and make the right choices.

The principles that guide our moral compass are important. They must be consistent with each other. If we hold a belief that is inconsistent with another belief, then we risk losing the integrity of our moral compass. For example, if we believe in the sanctity of life, then we must also believe in the importance of protecting the environment. If we believe in the value of individual freedom, then we must also believe in the importance of community responsibility.

In conclusion, a moral compass is a set of principles that guide our actions and decisions. It is important that we have a clear understanding of what constitutes a moral compass and that we make sure that our beliefs are consistent with each other. Only then can we truly say that we have a moral compass that is worthy of our trust.

Sincerely,
