MIT's art evolves over decades

By Jinnie Jung

The visual arts at MIT did not receive the same emphasis in the early years of the Institute as they do today. In the 19th century, MIT was a technical institute, focusing on engineering and science. However, in the early 20th century, MIT began to recognize the importance of the arts in education and culture.

In 1869, the first works of art were created at MIT, with the purchase of a painting by the visual artist Edwin H. Blashfield. The painting was intended to be part of the institute's collection, which was to be used to enhance the visual surroundings of the MIT community.

The MIT Art Committee was formed in 1961 to promote the non-curricular arts activities. The committee was responsible for acquiring permanent collections, arranging extended loans, obtaining grants for exhibitions and performances, and creating a visual arts space at MIT. Throughout the 20th century, the MIT Art Committee aimed to integrate the arts into the MIT community and the public.

The MIT Art Committee also took part in the annual loan program, which allowed students to use their collections for exhibitions in public spaces. The program was adopted in 1961, and the first international art exhibition was held at MIT in 1962.

In 1968, the Undergraduate Council on the Visual Arts (CVA) was formed at MIT. The CVA was created to promote non-curricular arts activities, including photography, sculpture, and art history. The CVA also worked to integrate the arts into the daily life of students at MIT.

The CVA was successful in promoting the visual arts at MIT, and by the 1970s, the Institute had a thriving visual arts program. Today, the MIT Art Committee is responsible for the Institute's art collection and exhibits, and continues to work towards the integration of the arts into the MIT community.

The MIT Art Committee is also responsible for the America's jumbo-jet gallery, which was created in 1972 to promote photography as an individual expression. The gallery has been successful in promoting contemporary art and has become a hub for the MIT visual arts community.
