The Coop is insensitive to MIT

As an undergraduate, I went to a university where there was a "campus store." It was much like the Tech Coop and was similarly located near the center of the university's social activities. Unlike the Coop, it always seemed to have the interests of the students in mind and hence deserved the name "campus store." It was much like a university where there was a "campus store." It was much like a university where there was a "campus store." It was much like a university where there was a "campus store." It was much like a university where there was a "campus store." It was much like a university where there was a "campus store."

Instead of trying to decide what to do with the space after the Coop leaves, the Coop committee should first try to persuade the Coop to renew its commitment to MIT and stay at the Straus Student Center. If that fails then they should start thinking about how to transform the space presently occupied by the Coop into a real "campus store." Sam Liao G
