MIT should not divest from companies which support apartheid in South Africa in accordance with the Sullivan principles. Arguments for complete divestment ignore the complexities of modern existence, especially with regard to the movement for freedom in South Africa and the British government's actions against apartheid. We, the members of the Undergraduate Association of MIT, are very distressed at the present situation. The community does have a fundamental interest in this issue, and we support the right of the protesters to demonstrate, especially since official channels have been denied.

We, the members of the Undergraduate Association Council, have decided to hold an open forum at the Corporation meeting next week to discuss the question of divestment and its implications.

The meeting never came to pass.

The only thing remaining, then, is to determine where the student body stands on the issue of divestment.
