Andrew Tauber G demands to speak to the MIT Corporation's member Alex B. Rosen '88, a member of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. Tauber said, "I'd like to distinguish between listening to you and doing what you tell us to do," Gray said. "The Corporation has heard your points."

"Where's the open forum of the ACSR?" Rosen asked. "Your protest was allowed. I have heard your protest," Gray replied. "I cannot speak for the ACSR. The Corporation will meet again." Rosen told Gray that the protesters would continue and escalate.

"There is very little this institution could do to affect South Africa," Gray said. "MIT can at best have a second order effect," he said. MIT is "not in the business of making foreign policy," he continued.

The Corporation decided it is possible to make a distinction among companies doing business in South Africa. Gray said, "We've heard that voice and other voices from South Africa," he said. "We've heard MIT's voice."

Gray then returned to his house. Tauber shouted, "You can't walk away."

Andrew E. Tauber G challenges Gray's statements. Tauber claimed that International Business Machines, a company which MIT considers to have a positive influence on South Africa, coordinates the payback laws in South Africa. Gray denied Tauber.

Gray then returned to his house.

Protesters then began chanting, "Paul Gray, you can't hide, you're on apartheid's side!"

Students attempt to block a Corporation member's office. We know you're on apartheid's side!

The Corporation decided it is possible to make a distinction among companies doing business in South Africa. Gray said, "MIT has no social responsibility in South Africa because they have no social responsibility here. I think we [the food workers] do belong here," he said. Bozzotto, who was also on the steering committee of the Coalition on South Africa, told the protesters that "Coalition must be broadened."
