Osgood to coach MIT hoops

By Alison C. Morgan

By the time he caught on, he had missed the party.

He had been lured away from basketball a long time ago. Fame and fortune had chased him to a career in social work. He had never really been able to stop coaching, though. It had been his life. Now, he was back in it full-time.

He had been coaching basketball for the last four decades. In that time, he had seen many changes in the sport. The players had become bigger, stronger, and faster. The games had become more intense and competitive. But, to Osgood, the game was still the same. It was a game of teamwork, strategy, and hard work.

When he first started coaching, basketball was a simple game. A group of kids would get together, throw a ball around, and see who was the best. It was a game of friends and fun. But, as the years passed, the game had changed. The players had become more professional, and the coaches had become more strategic.

Osgood had been the head coach of the men's basketball team at MIT for the last four years. He had built a team that was respected around the country. They had won several games and had made it to the Final Four. It had been a great run, but it was now time for him to move on.

He had made the decision to retire on March 12. As he turned the page on one chapter of his life, he looked forward to the next. He had been a coach for a long time, and he was ready for a new challenge.

Osgood would continue as associate head coach and move into the position of MIT assistant director of athletics. "It was tough to give up," he said. "But it's time for a new chapter."