ICF officers discuss plans

the legal liabilities associated with public entrance into the houses, according to Bhundari. Working out these and other associated problems and thus lessening the gulf between dormitory residents and fraternity members is a priority, he said.

One of the major problems facing the fraternities, in Bhundari's view, is the sometimes tense relations between various houses and neighborhood associations in Boston and Brookline. Both Turner and Bhundari saw an improved communication with such associations as the first step to a permanent solution.

The next step, Bhundari said, was the adoption of self-regulatory guidelines for the houses. He expected the IFC to approve a code of conduct in its meeting on May 3. This code "largely consists of common sense measures such as not screaming out of one window while it is raining in the morning," he said.

Bhundari stressed that the IFC would enforce the code, taking, if necessary, such judicial steps as restricting party privileges or requiring community service of a fraternity. The acid test of the code, he said, would come over the summer when high temperatures bred higher spirits.

The new executive board planned two major initiatives, Bhundari said. The first would be an aggressively pursued faculty advisor program. Currently only six of the 55 houses have such advisors, he said, and the IFC is trying to increase that number. One promising avenue in this search, he added, is alumni fraternity who had also been fraternity members.

Bhundari's other project is the possible creation of an honorary fraternity for brothers who contribute significantly to the Institute or the fraternity system. He mentioned possible association with the national order of Omega, which is such a fraternity with 150 chapters nationwide.

Of more immediate concern, Bhundari continued, was the smaller number of incoming males in the Class of '90. "This only means we will have to work harder at Rush this year, which is something we all realize," he said. He concluded that dry rush had a significant impact last year, yet he felt the eventual success of the rush hinges well for the future.
