Soviet reactor may burn for weeks

The US government claimed yesterday that the nuclear reactor on fire in USSR's Chernobyl plant may continue to burn for weeks, and that a second reactor might also have been damaged. The US government said yesterday that the reactor at Chernobyl has been surged out of control because of a meltdown, the molten of the installation's fuel rods after a series of failures. As Europe clamored for information on the nuclear disaster, the Soviets accused the West of blinding the public and of being incorrect in its assessments. The government denied Western reports that hundreds or even thousands may have died and has not officially acknowledged there was a fire at the Chernobyl plant. The Soviets insist that only two people were killed, and a government statement yesterday said only 18 of the 197 people originally hospitalized are in serious condition. The latest official word is that cleanup is underway around the plant, and radiation levels are dropping. The Soviets are still not saying high these levels were or exactly what they are now.

President Reagan, who is meeting with US allies in Indoneisa, welcomed yesterday the US being “close-minded” about the nuclear accident — making it difficult for the rest of the world to know what is going on. Secretary of State George Shultz PhD '49 said most of what the United States knows about the accident is coming from satellites — not the Soviets.

Radiation levels in Europe are accurate, but still above normal in places. The experts say none of the levels appears dangerous. Sweden and Denmark are still basing their food from the Soviet Union and Eastern (AP).

Norwegian parliament debated

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch's minority government yesterday agreed to a request from the opposition that it call a vote of confidence, but not until next week. Left Party joined with the tiny Progress Party to oppose the governing coalition. Willoch said he would recommend that King Olav V ask the leader of the opposition, Gro Harlem Brundtland, to form a new government. She had been prime minister until Willoch's election in 1981. (The New York Times)

The coalition of Willoch's Conservatives, the Christian Democrats, the Farmers, and the Liberals, will continue as a caretaker government until King Olav returns from Sweden today.

Willoch had called for the vote of confidence after introducing a tax of 5 per cent per litre to protect Norwegian farmers. The opposition rejected the measure, demanding instead a tax on the two cars, which holds the balance of power between the two sides, is anti-tax, and is said to be closed to the opposition parties of the left on the vote.

The US government claimed yesterday that the nuclear reactor on fire in USSR's Chernobyl plant may continue to burn for weeks, and that a second reactor might also have been damaged. The US government said yesterday that the reactor at Chernobyl has been surged out of control because of a meltdown, the molten of the installation's fuel rods after a series of failures. As Europe clamored for information on the nuclear disaster, the Soviets accused the West of blinding the public and of being incorrect in its assessments. The government denied Western reports that hundreds or even thousands may have died and has not officially acknowledged there was a fire at the Chernobyl plant. The Soviets insist that only two people were killed, and a government statement yesterday said only 18 of the 197 people originally hospitalized are in serious condition. The latest official word is that cleanup is underway around the plant, and radiation levels are dropping. The Soviets are still not saying high these levels were or exactly what they are now.

President Reagan, who is meeting with US allies in Indoneisa, welcomed yesterday the US being “close-minded” about the nuclear accident — making it difficult for the rest of the world to know what is going on. Secretary of State George Shultz PhD '49 said most of what the United States knows about the accident is coming from satellites — not the Soviets.

Radiation levels in Europe are accurate, but still above normal in places. The experts say none of the levels appears dangerous. Sweden and Denmark are still basing their food from the Soviet Union and Eastern (AP).

Norwegian parliament debated

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch's minority government yesterday agreed to a request from the opposition that it call a vote of confidence, but not until next week. Left Party joined with the tiny Progress Party to oppose the governing coalition. Willoch said he would recommend that King Olav V ask the leader of the opposition, Gro Harlem Brundtland, to form a new government. She had been prime minister until Willoch's election in 1981. (The New York Times)

The coalition of Willoch's Conservatives, the Christian Democrats, the Farmers, and the Liberals, will continue as a caretaker government until King Olav returns from Sweden today.

Willoch had called for the vote of confidence after introducing a tax of 5 per cent per litre to protect Norwegian farmers. The opposition rejected the measure, demanding instead a tax on the two cars, which holds the balance of power between the two sides, is anti-tax, and is said to be closed to the opposition parties of the left on the vote.

The US government claimed yesterday that the nuclear reactor on fire in USSR's Chernobyl plant may continue to burn for weeks, and that a second reactor might also have been damaged. The US government said yesterday that the reactor at Chernobyl has been surged out of control because of a meltdown, the molten of the installation's fuel rods after a series of failures. As Europe clamored for information on the nuclear disaster, the Soviets accused the West of blinding the public and of being incorrect in its assessments. The government denied Western reports that hundreds or even thousands may have died and has not officially acknowledged there was a fire at the Chernobyl plant. The Soviets insist that only two people were killed, and a government statement yesterday said only 18 of the 197 people originally hospitalized are in serious condition. The latest official word is that cleanup is underway around the plant, and radiation levels are dropping. The Soviets are still not saying high these levels were or exactly what they are now.

President Reagan, who is meeting with US allies in Indoneisa, welcomed yesterday the US being “close-minded” about the nuclear accident — making it difficult for the rest of the world to know what is going on. Secretary of State George Shultz PhD '49 said most of what the United States knows about the accident is coming from satellites — not the Soviets.

Radiation levels in Europe are accurate, but still above normal in places. The experts say none of the levels appears dangerous. Sweden and Denmark are still basing their food from the Soviet Union and Eastern (AP).

Norwegian parliament debated

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch's minority government yesterday agreed to a request from the opposition that it call a vote of confidence, but not until next week. Left Party joined with the tiny Progress Party to oppose the governing coalition. Willoch said he would recommend that King Olav V ask the leader of the opposition, Gro Harlem Brundtland, to form a new government. She had been prime minister until Willoch's election in 1981. (The New York Times)

The coalition of Willoch's Conservatives, the Christian Democrats, the Farmers, and the Liberals, will continue as a caretaker government until King Olav returns from Sweden today.

Willoch had called for the vote of confidence after introducing a tax of 5 per cent per litre to protect Norwegian farmers. The opposition rejected the measure, demanding instead a tax on the two cars, which holds the balance of power between the two sides, is anti-tax, and is said to be closed to the opposition parties of the left on the vote.

The US government claimed yesterday that the nuclear reactor on fire in USSR's Chernobyl plant may continue to burn for weeks, and that a second reactor might also have been damaged. The US government said yesterday that the reactor at Chernobyl has been surged out of control because of a meltdown, the molten of the installation's fuel rods after a series of failures. As Europe clamored for information on the nuclear disaster, the Soviets accused the West of blinding the public and of being incorrect in its assessments. The government denied Western reports that hundreds or even thousands may have died and has not officially acknowledged there was a fire at the Chernobyl plant. The Soviets insist that only two people were killed, and a government statement yesterday said only 18 of the 197 people originally hospitalized are in serious condition. The latest official word is that cleanup is underway around the plant, and radiation levels are dropping. The Soviets are still not saying high these levels were or exactly what they are now.

President Reagan, who is meeting with US allies in Indoneisa, welcomed yesterday the US being “close-minded” about the nuclear accident — making it difficult for the rest of the world to know what is going on. Secretary of State George Shultz PhD '49 said most of what the United States knows about the accident is coming from satellites — not the Soviets.

Radiation levels in Europe are accurate, but still above normal in places. The experts say none of the levels appears dangerous. Sweden and Denmark are still basing their food from the Soviet Union and Eastern (AP).

Norwegian parliament debated

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch's minority government yesterday agreed to a request from the opposition that it call a vote of confidence, but not until next week. Left Party joined with the tiny Progress Party to oppose the governing coalition. Willoch said he would recommend that King Olav V ask the leader of the opposition, Gro Harlem Brundtland, to form a new government. She had been prime minister until Willoch's election in 1981. (The New York Times)

The coalition of Willoch's Conservatives, the Christian Democrats, the Farmers, and the Liberals, will continue as a caretaker government until King Olav returns from Sweden today.

Willoch had called for the vote of confidence after introducing a tax of 5 per cent per litre to protect Norwegian farmers. The opposition rejected the measure, demanding instead a tax on the two cars, which holds the balance of power between the two sides, is anti-tax, and is said to be closed to the opposition parties of the left on the vote.

The US government claimed yesterday that the nuclear reactor on fire in USSR's Chernobyl plant may continue to burn for weeks, and that a second reactor might also have been damaged. The US government said yesterday that the reactor at Chernobyl has been surged out of control because of a meltdown, the molten of the installation's fuel rods after a series of failures. As Europe clamored for information on the nuclear disaster, the Soviets accused the West of blinding the public and of being incorrect in its assessments. The government denied Western reports that hundreds or even thousands may have died and has not officially acknowledged there was a fire at the Chernobyl plant. The Soviets insist that only two people were killed, and a government statement yesterday said only 18 of the 197 people originally hospitalized are in serious condition. The latest official word is that cleanup is underway around the plant, and radiation levels are dropping. The Soviets are still not saying high these levels were or exactly what they are now.

President Reagan, who is meeting with US allies in Indoneisa, welcomed yesterday the US being “close-minded” about the nuclear accident — making it difficult for the rest of the world to know what is going on. Secretary of State George Shultz PhD '49 said most of what the United States knows about the accident is coming from satellites — not the Soviets.

Radiation levels in Europe are accurate, but still above normal in places. The experts say none of the levels appears dangerous. Sweden and Denmark are still basing their food from the Soviet Union and Eastern (AP).

Norwegian parliament debated

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch's minority government yesterday agreed to a request from the opposition that it call a vote of confidence, but not until next week. Left Party joined with the tiny Progress Party to oppose the governing coalition. Willoch said he would recommend that King Olav V ask the leader of the opposition, Gro Harlem Brundtland, to form a new government. She had been prime minister until Willoch's election in 1981. (The New York Times)

The coalition of Willoch's Conservatives, the Christian Democrats, the Farmers, and the Liberals, will continue as a caretaker government until King Olav returns from Sweden today.

Willoch had called for the vote of confidence after introducing a tax of 5 per cent per litre to protect Norwegian farmers. The opposition rejected the measure, demanding instead a tax on the two cars, which holds the balance of power between the two sides, is anti-tax, and is said to be closed to the opposition parties of the left on the vote.