To the Editor:

We sympathize with those fraternities who had problems filling their houses and wish them better success in future rushes. It is, however, a big mistake to ignore the basic attidude that is evidenced by statements made by Mr. Daniel T. Dissmukes (MFH rush chairman).

“Dormitories should be a defecultion,” Mr. Dissmukes’ statemarent that dorms do not need to rush. Although fresmen enjoy the privilege of being able to exclude freshmen from their living group, they have no reonsibility to the dorms during rush. Rush is a hectic time for freshmen - they must choose one living group out of forty within a week. Most dorms do not have the necessity to fill beds.” is equally misleading in its implication that dorm residents don’t care which freshmen “fill beds” in their dorms. Many residence halls spend a large portion of their operating budget on R/O activities.
They do this in an effort to help the freshmen understand what each living group is about, socially and otherwise. The choice of where to live will have a great deal to do with what life will be like for a person over the next four years.

MIT is unique because it has so much to offer — and it is evermore competitive rush,” Sept. 91.

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to an article “Lower class size forces a more competitive rush,” Sept. 91.

It is disturbingly one-sided and filled with sterile and colorless groups. They are, however, a big issue that is being ignored by the fraternities at MIT. It is not all of the members of these fraternities that have problems filling
their houses and wish them better success in future rushes. It is, however, a big mistake to ignore the basic atti-
dude that is evidenced by statements made by Mr. Daniel T. Dissmukes (MFH rush chairman).

“Dormitories should be a defe-
cultion,” Mr. Dissmukes’ state-
mament that dorms do not need to rush. Although fresmen enjoy the privilege of being able to ex-
clude freshmen from their living
group, they have no re-
onsibility to the dorms during rush. Rush is a hectic time
for freshmen - they must
choose one living group out of
forty within a week. Most
dorms do not have the neces-
sity to fill beds.” is equally mis-
leading in its implication that
dorm residents don’t care which
freshmen “fill beds” in their
dorms. Many residence halls
spend a large portion of their operating budget on R/O activities.
They do this in an effort to help
the freshmen understand what
each living group is about, social-
ly and otherwise. The choice of
where to live will have a great
deal to do with what life will be
like for a person over the next
four years.

MIT is unique because it has
so much to offer — and it is ever-
more competitive rush,” Sept. 91.

I am writing in response to an
article “Lower class size forces a
more competitive rush,” Sept. 91.

It is disturbingly one-sided
and filled with sterile and colorless
groups. They are, however, a big
issue that is being ignored by
the fraternities at MIT. It is not all of the members of these fraternities that have problems filling
their houses and wish them better success in future rushes. It is, however, a big mistake to ignore the basic atti-
dude that is evidenced by statements made by Mr. Daniel T. Dissmukes (MFH rush chairman).

“Dormitories should be a defe-
cultion,” Mr. Dissmukes’ state-
mament that dorms do not need to rush. Although fresmen enjoy the privilege of being able to ex-
clude freshmen from their living
group, they have no re-
onsibility to the dorms during rush. Rush is a hectic time
for freshmen - they must
choose one living group out of
forty within a week. Most
dorms do not have the neces-
sity to fill beds.” is equally mis-
leading in its implication that
dorm residents don’t care which
freshmen “fill beds” in their
dorms. Many residence halls
spend a large portion of their operating budget on R/O activities.
They do this in an effort to help
the freshmen understand what
each living group is about, social-
ly and otherwise. The choice of
where to live will have a great
deal to do with what life will be
like for a person over the next
four years.

MIT is unique because it has
so much to offer — and it is ever-
more competitive rush,” Sept. 91.