US and Britain attack Syria for support of terrorism

Great Britain has joined the US and the other nations of the European Community in their threat to impose sanctions on Syria. Britain's announcement came Tuesday after the Israeli government's threat to impose sanctions on Syria. The Israeli government announced its decision after a meeting with representatives of other nations of the European Community in Brussels.

Britain's announcement was followed by a statement from the US government expressing support for the British decision. The statement said that the US government had not yet made a decision on whether to impose sanctions on Syria, but that it would consider the matter carefully.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem.

Britain's announcement was seen as a significant development in the continuing efforts to isolate Syria. The European Community has been trying to persuade Syria to adopt a more pro-Western stance, but Syria has so far refused to do so.

The US government has been critical of Syria's support for terrorism and has expressed concern about the country's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. The US government has also been concerned about Syria's role in the Middle East, particularly its support for the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO).

The US government has been considering a variety of options for dealing with Syria, including economic sanctions and diplomatic pressure. The US government has also been working with other nations of the European Community to develop a unified approach to the Syrian problem. 