We didn't know what was happening up until the last minute," Johnson said, referring to the possibility that students wouldn't be sent to the correctional institution. Police officers told him the only reason the students didn't go there was a lack of available space. "I was really scared."

These were the first widespread arrests on campus in at least 11 years, Keohane said.

Boycott and rally have "mixed" effect

The impact of Friday's boycott was "mixed," Keohane said after talking to representatives from Wellesley's largest departments, Art and English. Some professors held a vote to decide whether class would meet, while others cancelled class entirely, Keohane said. Her speech at the rally did not encourage students to return to class.

But student protestors found it difficult to explain why the rally attendance was only a fifth of the estimated number of students boycotting classes.

At the end of the rally, the protesters formed a human chain around the Wellesley academic Quadrangle and chanted, "We shall overcome" to the ringing of the Green Hall bell tower.

The Board of Trustees will take up the divestment issue again next February.
