So you think you want a car...

It's Tuesday evening and I'm starting grumpily into a VDT and sniffing at my coffee mug and slice of day-old pizza. I've been working hard, I've been editing opinion. I should have done it yesterday, but I was too busy, too little precooked. But this is not a complaint. I'm now aware of the stiffs and a bad attitude. Rarely does the VDT sink to a small, green object with four wheels and a kink for causing cryptography.

It's been five months since the Scirocco came into our lives. We were mere babes in the woods. Carl could now travel to and from his Wellesley office without enduring public transportation and a quarter mile walk in a business suit. We could do our grocery shopping without our backs and arms. Shopping malls were once again a reality. We were independent. Or so we thought.

When the electric fan died and the overheated engine almost fell off the car, we went to the suburbs for a lesson from the Scirocco. The summer for the overheated engine resulted in a

The car was new oil. But she seemed happy and wasn't even complaining.

One more trip to the suburbs for a lesson from the Scirocco. The summer for the overheated engine almost fell off the car, we went to the suburbs for a lesson from the Scirocco. The summer for the overheated engine resulted in a

I believe these to be reason-so that they can take steps to retrieve it MIT.

The Medical Department policy in this regard is totally irre- responsible and counter to the accepted insurance industry standards. Any insurance insurance policy can be purchased, whether it's for car, home, life or health, remains in effect until the policy holder requests a change. It is an event that the insurer is forced to cancel the policy for some reason, the insurer is always certain to inform the policy holder of their loss of coverage.

Specifically, I recommend that the Medical Department policy be changed so that:

- All MIT paid (faculty, staff, and students) for working whose MIT-sponsored insurance policy is cancelled, reduced or changed in any way without their consent.

- When a student family plan change/renewal form is not re- ceived, the default policy to continue the family plan with the coverage that was requested when the policy was initiated or last modified.

- All students whose policy is about to be cancelled be notified in writing so that they can take steps to retrieve it MIT.

Different, as they would add any significant burden to the Medical Department, given the computerization of modern record-keeping, while their po- licy benefit is comparatively enormous. I urge you to recognize that the existing policies, you are perpetuating, unreasonable and morally irresponsible policy. I do not know how you can sleep right.
