Institute offers services for disabled

Both Reed and Gravens commended Henderson for arranging readers and note-takers for them. Both meet with him regularly to work out any problems that arise.

Nevertheless, they found it hard to recommend MIT to others in their situation. Reed explained that she spends three times as long on reading as most students, requiring a vast amount of study time.

Gravens said he was fortunate to have completed most of his degree requirements before he became disabled. He imagined that attempting lab work with the limited use of his hands would be difficult.

Gravens described what was being done now as "groundbreaking." As the work of Henderson and others identifies and removes more of the barriers that exist at MIT, the way could be cleared for future disabled applicants.
