By Niraj Khetarkar

The MIT community is cooperating with the new Cambridge ordinance that took effect March 7, according to Vice President William J. Ricciardi '56.

Ricciardi's office, which revised MIT's smoking policy to comply with the Cambridge ordinance, received about a dozen phone calls last week, mainly in support of the new no-smoking policy. "Most of the objections came from smokers," he said. "Do you really mean I can't smoke in my office?" he asked.

Several people "unfairly, the administration will develop ways to enforce the ordinance," Ricciardi added.

Smokers react to ban

The new ordinance doesn't bother many smokers. Barry J. Culpepper, '87, a smoker interviewed on a cement bench outside of Lobdell, 'I used to chase my off campus," said. "I've quit three times already, but it's fun. I used to smoke a cigarette on the sidewalk. 'For the first time in my life, I felt like I was back. I had one little place where I'd hide and smoke,'" he added.

Although no one has told him to put a cigarette out, Culpepper has not touched one in nearly two years.

MIT meets with smoking laws to cooperate.

The Cambridge public health ordinance bans smoking from all buildings on the Cambridge campus, including libraries, lounges, and rec rooms. "Most people are restaurants having to comply with the ordinance," said Dickson. "The only objection I've heard is from smokers, "most people are certainly trying to smoke inside of lobbys," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

MIT has not made plans to enforce the ordinance, "about the only thing new over the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

By Pauline MacVicar

Tomorrow's proposal is derived from one made last fall by the ad hoc Committee on the HASS Requirement, chaired by Professor Pauline MacVicar. "It is 'a change that has been proposed,'" MacVicar said. "The proposal is intended to put the Cambridge ordinance into effect.

Several weeks ago, about 403 students and 156 distribution subjects in three of five categories.

The proposal is intended to put the Cambridge ordinance into effect.

The Cambridge public health ordinance bans smoking from all buildings on the Cambridge campus, including libraries, lounges, and rec rooms. "Most people are restaurants having to comply with the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

MIT has not made plans to enforce the ordinance, "about the only thing new over the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

By Pauline MacVicar

The MIT community is cooperating with the new Cambridge ordinance that took effect March 7, according to Vice President William J. Ricciardi '56.

Ricciardi's office, which revised MIT's smoking policy to comply with the Cambridge ordinance, received about a dozen phone calls last week, mainly in support of the new no-smoking policy. "Most of the objections came from smokers," he said. "Do you really mean I can't smoke in my office?" he asked.

Several people "unfairly, the administration will develop ways to enforce the ordinance," Ricciardi added.

Smokers react to ban

The new ordinance doesn't bother many smokers. Barry J. Culpepper, '87, a smoker interviewed on a cement bench outside of Lobdell, 'I used to chase my off campus," said. "I've quit three times already, but it's fun. I used to smoke a cigarette on the sidewalk. 'For the first time in my life, I felt like I was back. I had one little place where I'd hide and smoke,'" he added.

Although no one has told him to put a cigarette out, Culpepper has not touched one in nearly two years.

MIT meets with smoking laws to cooperate.

The Cambridge public health ordinance bans smoking from all buildings on the Cambridge campus, including libraries, lounges, and rec rooms. "Most people are restaurants having to comply with the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

MIT has not made plans to enforce the ordinance, "about the only thing new over the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

By Pauline MacVicar

The MIT community is cooperating with the new Cambridge ordinance that took effect March 7, according to Vice President William J. Ricciardi '56.

Ricciardi's office, which revised MIT's smoking policy to comply with the Cambridge ordinance, received about a dozen phone calls last week, mainly in support of the new no-smoking policy. "Most of the objections came from smokers," he said. "Do you really mean I can't smoke in my office?" he asked.

Several people "unfairly, the administration will develop ways to enforce the ordinance," Ricciardi added.

Smokers react to ban

The new ordinance doesn't bother many smokers. Barry J. Culpepper, '87, a smoker interviewed on a cement bench outside of Lobdell, 'I used to chase my off campus," said. "I've quit three times already, but it's fun. I used to smoke a cigarette on the sidewalk. 'For the first time in my life, I felt like I was back. I had one little place where I'd hide and smoke,'" he added.

Although no one has told him to put a cigarette out, Culpepper has not touched one in nearly two years.

MIT meets with smoking laws to cooperate.

The Cambridge public health ordinance bans smoking from all buildings on the Cambridge campus, including libraries, lounges, and rec rooms. "Most people are restaurants having to comply with the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

MIT has not made plans to enforce the ordinance, "about the only thing new over the ordinance," Dickson said. "It would be unfair to allow a minority of mainly administrators and facult to freedom to smoke," Dickson contended.

By Pauline MacVicar

The MIT community is cooperating with the new Cambridge ordinance that took effect March 7, according to Vice President William J. Ricciardi '56.

Ricciardi's office, which revised MIT's smoking policy to comply with the Cambridge ordinance, received about a dozen phone calls last week, mainly in support of the new no-smoking policy. "Most of the objections came from smokers," he said. "Do you really mean I can't smoke in my office?" he asked.

Several people "unfairly, the administration will develop ways to enforce the ordinance," Ricciardi added.

Smokers react to ban

The new ordinance doesn't bother many smokers. Barry J. Culpepper, '87, a smoker interviewed on a cement bench outside of Lobdell, 'I used to chase my off campus," said. "I've quit three times already, but it's fun. I used to smoke a cigarette on the sidewalk. 'For the first time in my life, I felt like I was back. I had one little place where I'd hide and smoke,'" he added.

Although no one has told him to put a cigarette out, Culpepper has not touched one in nearly two years.

MIT meets with smoking laws to cooperate.