Student describes arrest at the Wiesner Gallery

Fernandez was taken to the Cambridge Police for booking, where an inventory of belongings was performed. Fernandez's registration sticker was found during this inventory, indicating that he was registered for the spring term. Because it was then clear that Fernandez was indeed a student, he was returned to the Student Center, Olivieri said.

Fernandez said that if he was suspected of breaking and entering, he should have been charged with that crime and not trespassing. He demanded civil action against the Campus Police.

Olivieri said he "would welcome" any suit by Fernandez. He said the suspicion of the two students gave the Campus Police probable cause to ask for identification. He further said that the Campus Police demonstrated their good faith by releasing him when they ascertained his student status.

MIT hosts international conference on space

(Continued from page 10) has been drafted onto a rotating wheel in space, so that if one sets off walking in either direction one returns to Lobby 10 - if not an infinite one, an unbounded one.

The artist, Pat Rawlings, has included a few whimsical details as well: the year 2001 in Roman numerals on the great dome, a Texas flag stuck among the international standards.

ISU offerings will consist of a dozen hour-long lectures covering a variety of fields: Science, engineering, social issues, art and journalism in the space age are among the offerings.

These completing five "courses" will receive diplomas, dated April 12, 1987, the foundation date of the ISU, but also the 26th anniversary of the first human space flight, and the sixth anniversary of the first flight of a US Space Shuttle.
