American forces abroad which include public support, a "feast of simplicity," achievable, and a clear definition of objectives. No military action of the past seven years meet all of Hart's principles, including the bombing of Libya. The trouble with these explicitly strict guidelines, of course, is that a foreign power might be tempted to test Hart's resolve to stick to his principles when deliberately provoked.

In addition to his engagement guidelines, Hart is selling some non-so-new ideas, military reform and "strategic investment." To reforming the armed forces Hart would opt for cheaper and more effective weapons, such as attack submarines over aircraft carriers, effective weapons, such as attack submarines over aircraft carriers, and "strategic investment."
