US must be tough on China

Column by Matthew H. Hersch

I'm on an Asian kick this week that has no bounds. I've been studying the Cambodians and the Cambodian war, which is a tangled web of Vietnamese, Chinese, and Thai interests. And the Vietnamese have been the most vocal about the situation, which is ironic, considering their history.

In the past few years, the Chinese government has been trying to improve its image abroad by promoting cultural exchange and economic cooperation. However, this has been met with skepticism from the international community, who are concerned about the Chinese government's human rights record and its treatment of ethnic minorities.

The Chinese government has also been accused of maintaining a strong military presence in the region, which is a cause for concern among neighboring countries. The Chinese have been seen as a threat to regional stability, and their actions have been met with international condemnation.

I believe that the United States must be tough with the Chinese government and not allow them to get away with their behavior. The Chinese government must be held accountable for its actions, and the United States must be prepared to use force if necessary to protect its interests.

In conclusion, the Chinese government must be held accountable for its actions, and the United States must be prepared to use force if necessary to protect its interests. The Chinese must learn that they cannot simply do what they want in their region and that they must respect the rights of others.

Matthew H. Hersch, a sophomore in the Department of Physics, is an opinion editor of The Tech.