McGeever performance and the decision to attend graduate school, she said. Arthur C. Smith, dean for undergraduate education and student affairs, agreed that the self-help level is important. "Are we asking the students to do this?" McGeever said. The average student earns enough money after graduation to repay their debt. "Certainly there are associations of students who say they can't go to graduate school, but I don't think we have any evidence of that," Smith said.

The two models include salary increases for Institute employees of roughly 5.5 percent for the higher tuition model, and about 4 percent for the lower. The size of the tuition increase is tied almost directly to the size of the tuition increase, according to Culliton. The major source of revenue is tuition and the major source of expense is salary. You can get down to where it's almost a direct tradeoff between salary and tuition.

The Institute's budget is over $1 billion, but approximately 70 percent of that budget is research funding that the Institute has little control over. "We're looking at an operating budget that we have major control over that is about $200 million," Culliton said. Tuition accounts for $180 million of that budget.

The Academic Council discussed the need for salaries to remain competitive with other universities. "An increase of 6 percent is not going to give sufficient dollars so that you can attract junior faculty ... and retain senior faculty," Culliton said. Smith favored smaller increases in salary and tuition. "Right now is the time to keep the tuition increase as small as possible. If that means a relatively small increase for salary, then that is appropriate," he said.

Smith said he would choose the 6 percent tuition increase if he were forced to choose between the two models. "I'm not particularly eager to pick the lower of the two as the test," he cautioned.

The lower salary increases also received some support from Dean of Engineering Joel Moses PhD '67. "I think this year, given the situation at other universities, a smaller increase will be acceptable," he said.
