mis support which will attract large numbers of the best students in the nation, while at the same time controlling our costs so that those students can afford to come here."

"We are only responsible for paying approximately one half of the real expenses of attending MIT, it is still a bargain," Wrightson said.

In addition to the increase in tuition, the university's maximum self-help level was raised from $6,100 for this academic year to $6,600, an increase of 8.2 percent.

In fact, the amount of money that students are expected to provide from loans and employment before receiving scholarship assistance from MIT.

"We realize that these are unprecedented times," Wrightson said. "Students and families of students here are financially restrained right now."

Stacy E. McGeever '93, Undergraduates Association president, warned him that photographs were a constant in past years. "After we won in Maine, after we didn't often see them," he said, but "after we won in Maine, after we won in Colorado, and after we won in Nevada, people are starting to pay attention."
