No Immediate Sign of Resolution in California Budget Crisis

EXHIBIT POSTING

SACRAMENTO

Republican Gov. Pete Wilson and Assembly Speaker Willie L. Brown Jr. have declared a fiscal emergency and moved to pass a one-year state budget, but they have yet to resolve the 10-year dispute that has brought state government to the brink of collapse.

Wilson and Brown are locked in an僵持 that has paralyzed legislative action and cast doubt on the state's ability to provide essential services. The two leaders have been unable to agree on a budget that would fund the government for the next fiscal year, which begins July 1.

The stalemate has led to a series of last-minute deals that have failed to resolve the underlying issues. The latest proposal, which was unveiled Friday, called for a $15 billion, one-year budget that would cut services and increase taxes.

Wilson has been criticized for his failure to negotiate with Brown and the Democratic-controlled legislature. He has also been criticized for his handling of the state's financial crisis, which has led to a $2 billion budget shortfall.

Brown, for his part, has been praised for his leadership during the budget crisis. He has called for a special session of the legislature to pass a budget, and he has worked with Wilson to find a solution.

The next step in the budget negotiations is unclear. Both Wilson and Brown have said they are willing to work with each other, but they have yet to reach an agreement.

The failure to resolve the budget crisis threatens to undermine the state's economic stability and to harm the lives of millions of Californians. It also raises questions about the future of budget negotiations in the state and the nation as a whole.

UPDATE 9/21/92

Wilson and Brown have continued to work on the budget, but they have yet to reach an agreement. The budget is still in flux, and it is possible that it will not be passed until after the election.

The budget crisis has led to a series of last-minute deals that have failed to resolve the underlying issues. The latest proposal, which was unveiled Friday, called for a $15 billion, one-year budget that would cut services and increase taxes.

Wilson has been criticized for his failure to negotiate with Brown and the Democratic-controlled legislature. He has also been criticized for his handling of the state's financial crisis, which has led to a $2 billion budget shortfall.

Brown, for his part, has been praised for his leadership during the budget crisis. He has called for a special session of the legislature to pass a budget, and he has worked with Wilson to find a solution.

The next step in the budget negotiations is unclear. Both Wilson and Brown have said they are willing to work with each other, but they have yet to reach an agreement.

The failure to resolve the budget crisis threatens to undermine the state's economic stability and to harm the lives of millions of Californians. It also raises questions about the future of budget negotiations in the state and the nation as a whole.