Attacks in Middle East Continue Despite Negotiations

WASHINGTON

The attack came at mid-day. Out of an alley, gunmen fired automatic weapons fire into the Israeli army's rooftop outpost at the Cave of the Patriarchs, a site holy to Muslims and Jews, in the West Bank town of Hebron, killing one civilian and injuring another. The attacks foiled in a car.

And Monday, in retaliation for the roadside blast, Israeli forces bombarded several villages in southern Lebanon north of the Israeli area, as Israel occupied a Self-Defense zone. Reports from the area said that at least 10 civilians were killed in the bombings.

The attacks on Sunday were carried out by separate Arab groups, but together with Monday's Israeli retaliation they underscored a pattern of the Middle East peace talks that began a year ago at the Madrid conference. Although Israel, a Palestinian delegation and the neighboring Arab states are now at the bargaining table in Washington discussing peace, here in the Middle East there are armies, militias and individuals still fighting a series of deadly day-to-day conflicts.

Perot Steps Up Advertising Blitz

WASHINGTON

Ross Perot Monday stepped up the most expensive advertising blitz in presidential history, pushing new 30- and 60-second spots on the air in addition to his already formidable arsenal of half-hour commercials.

In the new ads, Perot takes dead aim at the news media, the two political parties and the argument that a vote for him would be a vote for the same old "Washington." "You've had enough of the same old politics," he says in one spot. "You've got to stop letting these folks in the press tell you what to do. You've got to vote for me, a new kind of human being." Perot's paid media efforts could well be overshadowed by the hard news coverage of his charges on "60 Minutes" Sunday that President Bush's campaign recently plotted to disrupt his daughter's wedding and wound his office. "He came across on '60 Minutes' like a loon, a wild, crazy, wealthy man," said Democratic consultant Mark Mellman.
