Freedom Appears Imminent for Cancer-Ridden Honecker

By Eugene Robinson

PORT-AU-PRINCE, HAITI

A week after the United States called for unrestricted elections in Haiti, the government of Jean-Bertrand Aristide, who has vowed never to let Aristide return, is preparing to pull out of the political process.

The move came in response to a wave of anti-American feeling that has gripped the Caribbean nation in recent weeks. The United States has long been a major supporter of the Aristide government, which has been under pressure to hold elections since 1990.

The government has indicated that it plans to withdraw from the political process in the coming days, as it has promised to do before.

The move was met with mixed reactions. Some Haitians welcomed the news, saying it was a step in the right direction. Others expressed concern that it would lead to further instability.

Haitians have faced a number of challenges in recent years, including political turmoil and a struggling economy.

The government has been under pressure to hold elections for several years, but has been unable to do so due to a number of factors, including political instability and a lack of resources.

It remains to be seen whether Aristide's government will be able to hold elections in the coming months. The United States has been calling for the government to hold elections, but it has been reluctant to do so due to concerns about the security situation.

The government has also been under pressure to address a number of other issues, including poverty and corruption. It remains to be seen whether it will be able to address these issues in the coming months.