McNeill, the director of housing and dining, said the average dollar per meal is too much. Usually I spend five to six dollars a meal. If they implement this plan, there will be a lot of people moving. I would have to move," Roberts said.

"What I would do is that they are losing that much money, that they close the dining hall and turn it into a big lounge," the added.

"I don't want to pay for it. We are traveling their dining halls on weekends."

"Michael M. Strong, '94, a MacGregor resident, said, "I know people who won't be around during the dinner hours -- especially people who play sports. Even though Baker is open later, it's not easy to go to a dining hall where you don't know anyone."

However, Victoria L. Parson, '94, a Baker resident, said, "I row crew, so I am all for anything that offers breakfast at Baker. I like eating at Baker. There's more variety of food -- more than Lobdell. All my friends eat there.""The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding residents, that means I have to go back to meal plans."

"Stroey also mentioned that the plan might adversely affect the House Dining Committee, which conducts extensive examination of various system pay for itself," said McNeill.

"The House Dining Committee which does the community," said McNeill.

According to a survey conducted by the House Dining Committee last March, most students said they didn't want the house dining halls to be closed, McNeill said. Almost 90 percent of the respondents said they wanted dinner served in their houses on Mondays through Thursday. Seventy-five percent wanted it on Friday and 50 percent wanted dinners in the house dining halls on weekends.

"The students want this, but they don't want to pay for it," said McNeill. "We are trying to listen to our student interests, " McNeill said.

The new dining plan is a result of several years of examining all aspects. Everybody has looked at this and it has been thorough. It accomplishes the objective we wanted to meet to fit student schedules, and to have a plan that pays for itself," said Lawrence E. Watson, director of housing and food services.

Residents find problems with plan

Many people expressed mixed reactions to the new dining plan. One complaint centered on the cost of the community meal.

"We don't like to eat in the dining halls right now. People don't want to eat at all-you-can-eat places at Baker," said Jason B. Thomas '94.

"One serious reservation [to the plan] is that I know from our survey that many women don't want to eat that much food. I hope they will introduce some way in which a la carte dining can be included in the plan," said Professor William B. Watson, the Baker housemaster.

"The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding women by the pricing policy, then we are excluding students in the community," Watson said.

Watson was also the chairman of the House Dining Committee. "I think it's on the whole a very good plan. I am very pleased," Watson said.

Margaret S. Roberts '95, a McCoomick Hall resident, said she will have to move out of her dorm if the plan is instituted.

"It sucks so bad. There aren't enough words to describe how bad it is. This is an all-girls dorm, and they just don't eat that much. Eight dollars per meal is too much. Usually I spend five to six dollars a meal. If they estimate it to be $2000 a year, there is no way I would pay it. If they implement this plan, there will be a lot of people moving. I would have to move," Roberts said.

"What I would do is that they are losing that much money, that they close the dining hall and turn it into a big lounge," the added.

"I don't want to pay for it. We are traveling their dining halls on weekends."

"Michael M. Strong, '94, a MacGregor resident, said, "I know people who won't be around during the dinner hours -- especially people who play sports. Even though Baker is open later, it's not easy to go to a dining hall where you don't know anyone."

However, Victoria L. Parson, '94, a Baker resident, said, "I row crew, so I am all for anything that offers breakfast at Baker. I like eating at Baker. There's more variety of food -- more than Lobdell. All my friends eat there.""The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding residents, that means I have to go back to meal plans."

"Stroey also mentioned that the plan might adversely affect the House Dining Committee, which conducts extensive examination of various system pay for itself," said McNeill.

"The House Dining Committee which does the community," said McNeill.

According to a survey conducted by the House Dining Committee last March, most students said they didn't want the house dining halls to be closed, McNeill said. Almost 90 percent of the respondents said they wanted dinner served in their houses on Mondays through Thursday. Seventy-five percent wanted it on Friday and 50 percent wanted dinners in the house dining halls on weekends.

"The students want this, but they don't want to pay for it," said McNeill. "We are trying to listen to our student interests, " McNeill said.

The new dining plan is a result of several years of examining all aspects. Everybody has looked at this and it has been thorough. It accomplishes the objective we wanted to meet to fit student schedules, and to have a plan that pays for itself," said Lawrence E. Watson, director of housing and food services.

Residents find problems with plan

Many people expressed mixed reactions to the new dining plan. One complaint centered on the cost of the community meal.

"We don't like to eat in the dining halls right now. People don't want to eat at all-you-can-eat places at Baker," said Jason B. Thomas '94.

"One serious reservation [to the plan] is that I know from our survey that many women don't want to eat that much food. I hope they will introduce some way in which a la carte dining can be included in the plan," said Professor William B. Watson, the Baker housemaster.

"The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding women by the pricing policy, then we are excluding students in the community," Watson said.

Watson was also the chairman of the House Dining Committee. "I think it's on the whole a very good plan. I am very pleased," Watson said.

Margaret S. Roberts '95, a McCoomick Hall resident, said she will have to move out of her dorm if the plan is instituted.

"It sucks so bad. There aren't enough words to describe how bad it is. This is an all-girls dorm, and they just don't eat that much. Eight dollars per meal is too much. Usually I spend five to six dollars a meal. If they estimate it to be $2000 a year, there is no way I would pay it. If they implement this plan, there will be a lot of people moving. I would have to move," Roberts said.

"What I would do is that they are losing that much money, that they close the dining hall and turn it into a big lounge," the added.

"I don't want to pay for it. We are traveling their dining halls on weekends."

"Michael M. Strong, '94, a MacGregor resident, said, "I know people who won't be around during the dinner hours -- especially people who play sports. Even though Baker is open later, it's not easy to go to a dining hall where you don't know anyone."

However, Victoria L. Parson, '94, a Baker resident, said, "I row crew, so I am all for anything that offers breakfast at Baker. I like eating at Baker. There's more variety of food -- more than Lobdell. All my friends eat there.""The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding residents, that means I have to go back to meal plans."

"Stroey also mentioned that the plan might adversely affect the House Dining Committee, which conducts extensive examination of various system pay for itself," said McNeill.

"The House Dining Committee which does the community," said McNeill.

According to a survey conducted by the House Dining Committee last March, most students said they didn't want the house dining halls to be closed, McNeill said. Almost 90 percent of the respondents said they wanted dinner served in their houses on Mondays through Thursday. Seventy-five percent wanted it on Friday and 50 percent wanted dinners in the house dining halls on weekends.

"The students want this, but they don't want to pay for it," said McNeill. "We are trying to listen to our student interests, " McNeill said.

The new dining plan is a result of several years of examining all aspects. Everybody has looked at this and it has been thorough. It accomplishes the objective we wanted to meet to fit student schedules, and to have a plan that pays for itself," said Lawrence E. Watson, director of housing and food services.

Residents find problems with plan

Many people expressed mixed reactions to the new dining plan. One complaint centered on the cost of the community meal.

"We don't like to eat in the dining halls right now. People don't want to eat at all-you-can-eat places at Baker," said Jason B. Thomas '94.

"One serious reservation [to the plan] is that I know from our survey that many women don't want to eat that much food. I hope they will introduce some way in which a la carte dining can be included in the plan," said Professor William B. Watson, the Baker housemaster.

"The dining halls are where communities are built. If we are excluding women by the pricing policy, then we are excluding students in the community," Watson said.

Watson was also the chairman of the House Dining Committee. "I think it's on the whole a very good plan. I am very pleased," Watson said.

Margaret S. Roberts '95, a McCoomick Hall resident, said she will have to move out of her dorm if the plan is instituted.

"It sucks so bad. There aren't enough words to describe how bad it is. This is an all-girls dorm, and they just don't eat that much. Eight dollars per meal is too much. Usually I spend five to six dollars a meal. If they estimate it to be $2000 a year, there is no way I would pay it. If they implement this plan, there will be a lot of people moving. I would have to move," Roberts said.

"What I would do is that they are losing that much money, that they close the dining hall and turn it into a big lounge," the added.