"It's a little more intense this year because there is a little more mud-slinging. It's just on a different level this year," Joung said. "I think it is very intense, and there is mud-slinging," Lee added. "My posters have been moved, torn down — I can't say it is the other candidates, but there is so much tension between the three of us. People are blaming each other for posters missing."

Lee added, "I feel really strongly about this class. There were a lot of things that could have been done but were not accomplished. I think I have realistic goals. I feel I can get them through."

"I'm running because I wanted to get the Class Council running. I feel the incumbent really hasn't done very much, and I want to change the apathy of our class," Sarkar said.

"I want to reach out to our class and if it means going door-to-door, I'll do that. I want to have free class T-shirts, a semiformal, and a band party," Sarkar added. "I think this race is very intense, I don't like it at all. I think if you make someone else look bad, then it doesn't make you look any better."

Joung said, "I'm running because I think I'm the best candidate for the job. I know the office, and I know what it is realistic. Other candidates have good ideas, but we have already tried to do most of that. They would just spend the year re-inventing the wheel." Joung also said that free class T-shirts would put the class in debt.

"I am running to get our class united," Joung said, "I'm running because I wanted to give people a voice on campus. I am experienced and motivated and I would like to meet each one of the Class of 1996."

Matthew J. Turner '96 said that he wants to build up school spirit and increase interaction among the class. He also plans to improve student-faculty communications by having socials with professors to help students in getting mentorships, UROP's, and jobs. He added, "I would like to address the concerns of the class to let us have a voice on campus. I am experienced and motivated and I would like to reach for comment last night."
