The three referendum questions addressing the protection of free speech in MIT's harassment policy are on the Undergraduate Association election ballots on Wednesday. The questions are:

- "Should MIT guarantee its students the same freedom of speech that students have at public universities?"
- "Should students have the freedom to express unpopular or controversial views?"
- "Should the MIT harassment policy, which currently restricts constitutionally protected speech, be revised to provide protection for freedom of speech?"

A group of students, including Lars E. Bader, collected undergraduate signatures so that these non-binding questions could appear on the ballot. According to Bader, the purpose of these questions is to "articulate discussion about the MIT harassment policy's speech curbs and encourage the administration to revise the policy to provide more freedom of speech."

In MIT's Policies and Procedures, sexual harassment is defined as "any conduct, verbal or physical, on or off campus, which has the intent or effect of unreasonably interfering with an individual's or group's educational or work performance at MIT, or which creates an intimidating, hostile, or offensive educational, work, or living environment."

Bader said this definition "raises serious freedom of speech concerns" because "well-intentioned people can hold views that are very offensive to each other." Similar policies at University of Wisconsin and University of Michigan were found to be unconstitutional in federal courts, he said.

Bader stressed that he does not "condone any harassment, regardless of severity." He added, "I do believe that offensive speech, unless it is deliberately offensive and directed at an individual, is not harassment. For that reason I oppose its regulation."

He outlined several recommendations to change the Institute's harassment policy during his presentation to the UA Council last Monday. Bader said that one should only be punished for his speech if he intended to offend, if he continued speaking offensively after a warming, and if the speech was uninvited, not including violent and sexual threats.

Moreover, "Speech which consists only of expression of ideas and opinions, with no element of hostility and no immediately threatening nature, should not constitute harassment under MIT's policy, regardless of how 'offensive' the speech is. Controversial views should not be stilled," Bader said.

He also supported a policy which would allow those who disagree with an accusation to present their view, only punish an alleged harasser if he knew his actions were unwanted, give tougher punishment in cases where harassment involved abuse of power, place rape and sexual assault under separate, stricter policies, and publish harassment guidelines.
