New York, Utah to Meet in Final: Jets Trade for Johnson

By Mike Duffy and Adam Heilman

The Jets begin with a recap of the important events of the NFL draft. The first surprise on Sunday came when the Jets, with literally five seconds on the clock, traded their number three pick to Phoenix for their four pick and backing off Johnny Johnson, letting the Cavs take running back Garrison Hearst and then picking linebacker Marvin Jones.

The Jets needed both running and linebacking, so their masterstroke trade brought them great benefits, proving on the Cardinals' known desire for Hearst. But the trade also worked out well for Phoenix, who assured themselves of the division by selecting the best in the back country in exchange for a player they probably wouldn't have had to trade or cut sometime in the future if Hearst pans out. The Cavs made a mistake in the NFC East with an offensive featuring Hearst, Steve Burtlem and Gary Clark.

The perennial debate in MVP balloting in any sport — the definition of "valuable" is the award to the player with better statistics or the one on the better team — held true in the NBA this season. While a good argument can be made for the player with better statistics or the one on the better team (on a worse team), Barkley has shown the whole season why this is. Of course the Rockets are not a 55- win team without The Dream, but Phoenix is not close to being the best team in the NBA without Sir Charles. Ewing's vindication for not being the MVP is an NBA title, Wilkins had a great year, consider...
