Prospects for a broader peace in the Middle East were clouded today with clear gains in negotiations between the bitterest enemies: Israel and Syria.

The progress gave a signal that Syria and Israel are beginning to negotiate serious issues, however, they would not try to undercut an Israeli-Palestinian accord reached in secret, and may be looking to an Israeli-Palestinian settlement as a springboard toward Middle East peace to extract the concessions he can get from Israel.

But Israelis cautioned Thursday that serious progress couldn't be made without language than substance; and Syria.

The Clinton administration continued its most direct confrontation yet with Ross Perot Thursday, charging that the Texas billionaire is spreading misinformation and falsehoods in his campaign to scuttle the North American Free Trade Agreement.

The counteroffensive by U.S. Treasury Secretary Robert E. Rubin and other administration officials showed how seriously the administration was taking Perot's threat to push NAFTA into the gutter; although in May 27, 1993 Congress voted late in the evening on May 27, 1993. However, in the fast track track for NAFTA voting.

The Clinton administration has announced it will make a case against NAFTA if it is "riddled with inaccuracies, errors and misleading statements" that could result in a constitutional "veto.

The high court said that employers can't discriminate against overweight people if their government agencies have determined the condition is a physical handicap protected by law.

But the decision protects obese people only if they can show their weight meets the definition of a disability under state law or demonstrate that they were not hired because of that perceived disability.

In deciding the case, the court said that weight may qualify as a protected characteristic if it results from a "psychological or physical illness or injury," rather than a constitutional "veto" of the fast track track for NAFTA voting.
