FCC Cares Clear For Communications Revolution

WASHINGTON

The Federal Communications Commission Thursday threw open the doors of the communications services that technologists say could transform the way people communicate much as the invention of the telephone did more than a century ago.

The move is expected to do for each area of personal communications services market into large and small blocks of service. Many small service blocks of the very large systems and small ones with less range could be created.

The FCC also began considering rules for auctioning the thousand different service areas, anticipated that each might sell for $10 billion would be raised for the government's coffers through the process.

If the promise of the new technology becomes a reality, Americans have grown used to the freedom that cellular phones afford them. But long distance calls are cheaper and more convenient, and the quality of sound is often better, too.
