The Russian government shut 15 opposition newspapers Thursday and ordered two others to close, a move the Kremlin said was in reaction to protests and a fresh round of demonstrations that they want to refuse paying.

The actions by President Boris Yeltsin's press ministry came as the government was in the wake of the bloody suppression of a hard-line uprising Oct. 4. That showdown, the bloodiest since tanks loyal to Yeltsin ended a rebellion by Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and his supporters in the parliament.

The three-day battle, which left 450 people dead, has left Yeltsin reeling and has forced the government to adopt new measures to tighten control over the press.

Yeltsin's press ministry said in a statement Thursday that it shut the 15 newspapers because they had published "false, scandalous and illegal materials" that urged theFixture and assistance in the wake of the bloody suppression of a hard-line uprising Oct. 4. That showdown, the bloodiest since tanks loyal to Yeltsin ended a rebellion by Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and his supporters in the parliament.

The three-day battle, which left 450 people dead, has left Yeltsin reeling and has forced the government to adopt new measures to tighten control over the press.

Yeltsin's press ministry said in a statement Thursday that it shut the 15 newspapers because they had published "false, scandalous and illegal materials" that urged the

The Russian government shut 15 opposition newspapers Thursday and ordered two others to close, a move the Kremlin said was in reaction to protests and a fresh round of demonstrations that they want to refuse paying.

The actions by President Boris Yeltsin's press ministry came as the government was in the wake of the bloody suppression of a hard-line uprising Oct. 4. That showdown, the bloodiest since tanks loyal to Yeltsin ended a rebellion by Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and his supporters in the parliament.

The three-day battle, which left 450 people dead, has left Yeltsin reeling and has forced the government to adopt new measures to tighten control over the press.

Yeltsin's press ministry said in a statement Thursday that it shut the 15 newspapers because they had published "false, scandalous and illegal materials" that urged the

The Russian government shut 15 opposition newspapers Thursday and ordered two others to close, a move the Kremlin said was in reaction to protests and a fresh round of demonstrations that they want to refuse paying.

The actions by President Boris Yeltsin's press ministry came as the government was in the wake of the bloody suppression of a hard-line uprising Oct. 4. That showdown, the bloodiest since tanks loyal to Yeltsin ended a rebellion by Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and his supporters in the parliament.

The three-day battle, which left 450 people dead, has left Yeltsin reeling and has forced the government to adopt new measures to tighten control over the press.

Yeltsin's press ministry said in a statement Thursday that it shut the 15 newspapers because they had published "false, scandalous and illegal materials" that urged the

The Russian government shut 15 opposition newspapers Thursday and ordered two others to close, a move the Kremlin said was in reaction to protests and a fresh round of demonstrations that they want to refuse paying.

The actions by President Boris Yeltsin's press ministry came as the government was in the wake of the bloody suppression of a hard-line uprising Oct. 4. That showdown, the bloodiest since tanks loyal to Yeltsin ended a rebellion by Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and his supporters in the parliament.

The three-day battle, which left 450 people dead, has left Yeltsin reeling and has forced the government to adopt new measures to tighten control over the press.

Yeltsin's press ministry said in a statement Thursday that it shut the 15 newspapers because they had published "false, scandalous and illegal materials" that urged the