Frustrated U.N. Commander in Bosnia Resigns

The Clinton administration is weighing whether to delay a requirement that states help pay for abortions in cases of rape or incest, because the doctrine had placed some states in the complex position of either violating their own laws or losing federal Medicaid funds, officials said Tuesday.

"They set these states up to be on the horns of a dilemma," said Ray Haly, head of the Arkansas Medicaid program and chair of the State Medicaid Directors Association.

The economic reform program, which took effect last year, has reduced federal spending in Chiapas from $500 million to $250 million in the past five years to $250 million. The federal government and the Zapatista National Liberation Army, the guerrillas, talked last week in Mexico City that Chiapas ...
