Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Thursday he is negotiating with the right-wing Tsohat Party to form a new government with the Islamic National Movement, a small group aligned with the Palestinian Liberation Organization against self-government.

"We see it as an urgent necessity to broaden the coalition basis of the government, and I intend to take action to reach that goal," Rabin declared.

But officials say they are confident the new coalition government, even though the Tsohat Party and the Islamic National Movement have declared, will join the Government of National Self-Government.

"The immediate goal is to broaden the coalition base, and to go to the Knesset to warrant an expression of disapproval but not a for...
