Russia Plans to Join NATO’s Partnership for Peace Soon

By Richard Boudreau

Washington, D.C.

Russia said Thursday that the U.S. and Russia have agreed to join NATO’s Partnership for Peace (PfP) program. The agreement will be announced next Monday at a meeting in Moscow between Defense Secretary William Cohen and Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev. This agreement is significant because it represents another step in the process of bringing Russia into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The decision to join PfP is a significant move for both Russia and NATO. Russia has made great strides in recent years to stabilize its government and to become a more stable and reliable partner in the global community. By joining PfP, Russia will be able to work more closely with NATO on a range of issues, including arms control, non-proliferation, and counterterrorism. The agreement also sends a clear message to the world that Russia is committed to working with NATO to promote peace, security, and stability in the region. This is an important milestone in the process of integrating Russia into the Western alliance, and it is a sign of growing cooperation between Russia and NATO. Overall, this agreement represents a significant step forward for both countries and for the future of European security.