Ngan said he was shocked that this is the first time such a survey is being done. "It's usefulness will depend on how, the results are implemented, but I think it will show lots of interesting things," he said.

"I think the response I give will make absolutely no difference at all," said Mark S. Grodzinsky '94. "The professors are there for research, and teaching makes no difference. They're interested in things that bring in more money even at the expense of teaching," he said. Lipson released some comments from the senior surveys which have already been submitted. Many students have had positive things to say about their experiences as undergraduates. Lipson said.

These comments include:

"Nothing else compares. While you may sacrifice some things here, it's the only choice if you want to see what you are capable of." The best thing is being among always people smarter than you does not let one be completely satisfied.

"Meeting people from all parts of the world and seeing different perspectives on life. Working together with others to do homework in my living group. Both have been very rewarding for me."

Seniors also had many negative things to say, Lipson said.

"Though academically I have been challenged, I do not feel MIT provides for an equivalent emotional and social maturity. It is important to train the great potential here for future leadership roles, with
