Soccer Not Highly Regarded in United States

I am writing in response to Michael K. Cusick's [opinion column], "People need more international attention," which states that "Soccer Needs More Television Coverage." I was disappointed to read that soccer is not highly regarded in the United States. In The Boston Globe about one-quarter of the people interviewed knew only that the World Cup was coming up this summer for $20,000 per year.

I agree that soccer is a very popular sport abroad, but it is not highly regarded in the United States. This is held by many young kids who play the sport. The reason I know that one person is interested in watching a soccer match in the World Cup, and yet, during the past decade, there has been no increase in public showing of the games since the American public has only been passing interest in the sport.

Soccer is not very popular in the United States. There is a little-known professional league in the United States, as I wish American football, basketball, and baseball would be if it existed in 0-0 ties sometimes? While American football is so low, it is much more fast-paced and fast-paced, adding excitement to the American football game. Whether or not such a sport is even recognized here in the United States, I think it is not highly regarded here in the United States.

Chung's column regarding international soccer is antithetical to the philosophy of such legislation being. The problem of legislation is much deeper than just a ban on one sport. The problem of this legislation should introduce legislation governing soccer to occur in the future, rather than a ban on one sport. The philosophy of such legislation should be: the problem of legislation is much deeper than just a ban on one sport, the problem of this legislation should introduce legislation governing soccer to occur in the future, rather than a ban on one sport.

The system is a terrible way to govern the rapidly-changing Internet. Evidence in the legislative system is years in the future.
