By Daniel Williams
THE WASHINGTON POST

Cuba and the United States agreed Saturday to hold talks on Monday in Havana on measures to stem the flow of boat people in the Caribbean. The talks will be the second such meeting in 18 days, the Cuban government said.

The talks will deal with issues related to the promotion of legal, orderly, and safe migration, the Cuban government said. State Department spokesman Michael McCurry confirmed that the talks will focus on the issue of boat people.

The talks are part of a growing rift in the leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution (PDR), which has proposed a new constitution that would disband the PRI.

The PRI, which has governed Cuba since 1959, has been日益受到挑战 from the PDR, which has been gaining support among the Cuban people.

The PDR has called for the release of political prisoners and for greater freedom of speech.

The PRI has resisted these demands, but has agreed to hold talks with the PDR.

The talks are scheduled to take place in Havana on Monday, and will be attended by high-level representatives from both sides.

By Karen Yamato
THE WASHINGTON POST

What went wrong with the Clinton health care plan? Why did it fail? And how can it be fixed? These are the questions that are being debated in Washington these days.

There are several factors that contributed to the failure of the Clinton health care plan.

First, the plan was too complex and included too many components. It was a mammoth package that included everything from prescription drug coverage to national health insurance.

Second, the plan was controversial and faced strong opposition from both sides of the aisle.

Third, the timing was off. The plan was introduced in the middle of the 1994 midterm elections, which made it difficult to get any real momentum.

Fourth, the public was not very knowledgeable about the plan.

Although the Clinton health care plan failed, it was not a complete failure.

The plan did achieve some important goals, such as providing coverage to millions of uninsured Americans.

The plan also helped to bring attention to the issue of health care reform.

As we move forward, it is important to learn from these mistakes and work towards a more effective plan.