U.S. States Condemn California Anti-Immigrant Law, Euthanasia

By Holly Selby

WASHINGTON

U.S. Roman Catholic bishops condemned Thursday California’s Proposition 187, which denies legal status to Hispanics who are undocumented immigrants, and reaffirmed the Catholic church’s position that every human being has a right to health care until the moment of death.

However, doctors may give pain medication to a terminally ill person even after the patient’s death has been declared — as long as the sole goal is palliation of suffering.

In response, they developed a “principle of cooperation” that outlines how Catholic hospitals can integrate programs with other organizations without going against a patient’s wishes. They also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuative allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.

The scenarios also have cautioned that any unilateral lifting of the arms embargo unilaterally, to arm and train Bosnian government soldiers and to help evacuate allied troops now on peacekeeping duty in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The scenarios, outlined in classified briefings with leading lawmakers, include the possibility of arming and training Bosnian government forces, but with a risk of widening the war to many more civilians. The cost of the proposed plan could be as high as $1 billion.